TOLERANCE AND ITS LIMITS IN TWELFTH
CENTURY KASHMIR: TANTRIC ELEMENTS IN KALHAṆA'S *RĀJĀTARAṄGIṆĪ

Introduction: questions of genre

Kalhaṇa's Rājatarāṅgiṇī (RT) is often cited as a unique Sanskrit work on ancient Indian, in particular Kashmirian, history, which unlike most purāṇic sources aims to relate actual historical facts.¹ While the uniqueness of this chronicle is undoubtable, it should also be emphasized that Kalhaṇa himself does not reject purāṇic sources, as is clear from his introduction² and from his use of the Nīlamatapūrāṇa to reconstruct Kashmir's ancient past.³

* The first version of this paper was delivered at the Tantra and Āgama section of the 15th World Sanskrit Conference in New Delhi, on the 8th of January 2012. My participation was financed by the UMR 7528 Mondes iranien et indien (CNRS-EPHE-INaLCO-Sorbonne Nouvelle). I am grateful to Jürgen Hanneder for his comments on this paper and his help; and to students who attended my seminar on tantric and puranic elements in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, Section des sciences religieuses (Paris), in 2010-11.

² RT 1.14. For the Nīlamatapūrāṇa itself, see the editions by K. de Vreese, Nīlamata or Teachings of Nīla. Sanskrit Text with Critical Notes, Leiden, 1936 and Ved Kumari, The Nīlamata Purana, Srinagar, 1973. See also A Study of the Nīlamata, aspects of Hinduism in ancient Kashmir, ed. Ikari Y. Kyoto, 1994.

Most research on the Rājatarāṅgiṇī attempts to strip the text of purāṇic and other legendary or religious material and to identify major historical events, the chronology of kings and the like on the basis of Kalhaṇa's account, compared with other independent witnesses.⁴ While such work is necessary and important, other aspects of Kalhaṇa's account have been somewhat less focused upon (with some notable exceptions), including what he may tell us about religion and religious history.⁵

Concerning religious history, even more caution should be applied than in the case of Kalhaṇa's political history. Most myths and legends cited by Kalhaṇa certainly reflect the state of religious currents of his own time rather than of the past he deals with. In spite of problems of chronology, an analysis of religion as described by Kalhaṇa would certainly be useful at least in one respect: to determine Kalhaṇa's own point of view in religious matters. If Kalhaṇa's position becomes clearer, it may also help us to evaluate some of his remarks concerning certain religious currents.

There is of course a certain circularity involved in this inquiry: Kalhaṇa is used to determine his own potential partiality, and then we turn back to him to look for other facts. However, in reality, the circle is usually not completed in full; rather, one question leads to another, although the answers may sometimes be lacking.

Kalhaṇa has been particularly referred to as witness to various tantric or āgamic cults and practices: he mentions several tantric masters, esoteric practices of the yoginī cult, the installation of Śaiva images etc.⁶ In this paper, I would like to concentrate on a few details that may help us to define better which of these were recommendable, acceptable or unacceptable to Kalhaṇa, and therefore to what extent Kalhaṇa's attitude can be considered tolerant.

First, I shall use an example to show that not everything that potentially looks tantric in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī may indeed belong to tantrism proper. Second, I shall examine some cases in which the king seems to be involved in tantric practices. Finally, I shall cite a few instances in which certain tantric gurus seem to cause the fall of a king. These case studies may shed some light on Kalhaṇa's position concerning tantric cults and traditions. I shall use the word tantric (tāntrika) in the more restricted sense of the word, involving the prescription of impure offerings, cremation ground practices and the like, and excluding the domains of mainstream saiddhāntika śaivism.

Mother goddesses are not always tantric

The circle of Mothers or māṭṛcakra is a recurring set of deities in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī. Stein assumes⁷ that the word māṭṛcakra is a synonym of devīcakra and rājñīcakra ('circle of goddesses'), denoting a group of female tantric deities represented in a diagram on stone. In the same context, another translator, R.S. Pandit, identifies them as the set of seven mothers including Vārāhī, represented as statues.⁸ Stein's assumption could be supported by the fact that māṭṛ- is indeed used as a synonym of tantric goddesses, but whether or in what sense they are indeed tantric goddesses in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī is doubtful.

They figure several times in connection with installations in temples: a certain Ugra, guru to king Kṣīṅkhila also known as Kṣīṅgala (who appears to have ruled in the first third of the seventh century),⁹ established in his own name a god called Ugreśa and a circle of mothers (māṭṛcakra).¹⁰ Similarly, Śreṣṭhasena, also known as Pravarasena the first (unidentified),¹¹ founded a sanctuary for a deity called Pravareśvara, together with a māṭṛcakra.¹² In these cases, the circle of mothers seems to accompany the main male deity, possibly with a protective function. However, nothing suggests that they receive esoteric tāntrika worship. The names imply rather that the male deity is perhaps in the form of a liṅga established in the name of the sponsor, according to general śaiva practice.¹³ No tāntrika cult needs to be assumed here. The māṭṛs may well be represented by statues (unlike most tāntrika mothers) or otherwise, although whether there were seven or eight of them is another question.

⁷ In the note to his translation at 1.122.

In other contexts, when the māṭṛs are associated with tāntrika practices in some way, they may well be tantric, as well as the male deity who accompanies them. One such story concerns king Baka (said to be son of Mihirakula),¹⁴ who, attracted by a yoginī called Bhaṭṭā, becomes a sacrificial victim offered to a circle of goddesses (devīcakra).¹⁵ The yoginī acquires supernatural powers and flies up into the sky. At the end of the story, it is mentioned ⁹ Stein in RT vol. I. p. 65 and p. 80 identifies this Khinkhila as a hephthalite ruler, placing him in the fifth or sixth century. However, D.C. Sircar in Epigraphia Indica, 1963, p. 44 identifies the name Khiṅgala in an inscription (found in Kabul, originally from Gardez, on a Vināyaka image) with Khinkhila, and on paleographical grounds places the inscription in the first half of the seventh century. See also further references to this king in A. Biswas, A Political History of the Hūnas in India, New Delhi, 1973, p. 137. The dating Biswas proposes is between 597 and 633.

¹⁰ According to RT 1.348.

¹¹ The only mention of this king seems to appear in Kalhaṇa's RT, see Stein in RT vol. I. p. 82.

¹² See RT 3.99.

¹⁴ No other source than Kalhaṇa's RT is available on this king, see Stein in RT vol. I. p. 79.

¹⁵ This story has been referred to and analysed in O. Serbaeva, Yoginīs, p. 190 ff.

that the footprints of the yoginī, a god named Śatakapāleśa and the circle of mothers provide a recollection of this event in the monastery (maṭha) of Kherī.¹⁶

The god Śatakapāleśa or ‘the Lord of a Hundred Skulls’ could well be a tāntrika deity. His name suggests cremation ground or kāpālīka practices similar to those of the Brahmayāmala, whose main male deity is Kapālīśa.¹⁷ The story itself, in which the king is a sacrificial victim, is clearly based on tāntrika ritual or on the way in which it was perceived, and it is also reasonable to assume that the circle of mothers associated with Śatakapāleśa represents the circle of goddesses to which Bhaṭṭā offers the victim.¹⁸ The deities of the legend, however, must not be confused with the deities of the Maṭha of Kherī. While the legend clearly refers to blood-thirsty tantric goddesses, the actual circle of mothers who remind us of these events may well receive non-tantric worship, just as Śatakapāleśa could also be a frightening, but non-tantric deity.

A similar but less evidently tantric context is seen in the story of how Śūra, minister to Avantivarman (r. 855/6–883),¹⁹ has the chief of the ḍāmaras killed in a temple.²⁰ The king worships Bhūteśa in a nearby temple while his minister lures the ḍāmaras to the temple of Bhairava and the mothers. He then decapitates the chief ḍāmara in front of Bhairava. The scene suggests that the act is intended at the same time as a bloody offering to the god. The

¹⁹ It is with this king that we reach truly historical records in Kalhaṇa, as Stein observes in RT vol. I. p. 97.

mothers may be tantric inasmuch as the main Bhairava image could be tantric and receive a human offering, although, as Kalhaṇa points out, the body of the ḍāmara was then simply dumped in the nearby water tank.

What these examples show is that the māṭṛcakra or circle of mothers is commonly associated with a male deity. The nature and cult of these mothers are probably determined by the male deity they are attached to: they may receive ordinary worship or the tāntrika one accordingly, but in most cases they seem to belong to mainstream śaivism.

Although māṭṛs mostly accompany a male deity in the Rājataranṅinī, there is nevertheless one example in which the circle of mothers figures independently: queen Īśānadevī, king Jalauka's wife,²¹ installed circles of mothers in the regions that formed the gateways of the kingdom.²² No matter what kind of worship these mothers, ‘powerful with their force,’²³ received, they had clearly a protective function. Given the context, it is again more likely that they are intended as some kind of warrior mothers without necessarily being tāntrika. They are deities who need to be fierce to protect the enclosed place against intruders, quite similarly to Bhairava functioning as a doorkeeper at temple entrances.

To what extent is the king supposed to be involved in tantric practices?

The story involving king Avantivarman’s minister leads us to another question. While the minister Śūra performs as it were a human sacrifice of the ḍāmara chief in front of Bhairava, the king remains in the nearby temple of Bhūteśa. Why does he need to stay away? Perhaps it is better for a ruler not to be involved in a massacre. Or perhaps the king is kept at a distance to protect him from the potentially ill effects of an impure sacrifice. It is uncertain whether his absence is significant here from a religious point of view, for Śūra certainly needs to get the dirty business done without the king being present.

While the narration of Śūra’s massacre does not focus on the king’s role, the story of king Baka, who is sacrificed by a yoginī, seems to serve as an explicit warning to kings: they better not get involved in rites of magic concerning yoginīs, lest they should become the victims to be sacrificed.

²³ The adjective prabhāvogra and the choice of words in the above sentence is reminiscent of the description of mothers that Khīnkhila’s minister established around Ugreśa. Īśānadevī’s Mothers are said to be prabhāvogra (fierce with their power), while Ugra’s mothers are prabhāvodagravīgraha (whose forms are radiant with their power). Īśānadevī herself is said to be radiant (udagrā), while Ugra himself possesses the name ‘fierce.’ Thus, in both cases, the words ugra, udagra and prabhāva recur in the context of Mothers. This may be due to the fact that Kalhaṇa uses a somewhat stereotyped description; but it could also show that the same type of powerful, but not necessarily tantric, mothers are denoted.

The warning does not imply that the king must refrain from any act of tantric magic or from dealing with goddesses who possess supernatural powers. As book 3 relates,²⁴ King Raṇāditya²⁵ fell in love with the goddess Bhramaravāsīnī who lived on the Vindhya mountain. The name and location of the goddess suggest that she may be a (Kashmirian?) mixture of Vindhyaśīnī and the bee-goddess Bhramarāmbā.²⁶ They got married in a subsequent birth, when the goddess became incarnate as princess Raṇārambhā. The story mentions several times that Raṇārambhā retained her supernatural powers such as her divine vision; and, since she was uncomfortable with the idea of sleeping with a mortal, she placed her own double next to her husband every night and flew out herself in the form of a bee. The same goddess gave her husband the mantra of Hāṭakeśvara, which helped him to descend to the underworld and enjoy himself there for many years—a superhuman achievement which is called pātālasiddhi in many tantric texts.²⁷ Moreover, Hāṭakeśvara is indeed the deity in charge of the underworlds or of the uppermost golden level of pātāla, according to, for instance, the Svacchandatantra.²⁸ The king's

²⁵ As Stein puts it (RT vol. I. p. 86), this king seems to be a fairy-tale hero rather than a real ruler.

²⁸ See Svacchanda 9.43, 10.115. The Kathāsaritsāgara (ed. P. Durgaprasad and K.P. Parab, rev. W.L.S. Pansikar, Bombay, 1930, 12.6.116 ff.) also mentions that Hāṭakeśvara is worshipped as the god of the underworld (12.6.124). In this story, people gain access to the pātāla by worshipping the goddess Śārikā. This worship appears tantric (at least in the weaker sense of the word, i.e. following śaiva scriptures), for it starts with the closing of the directions (digbandhana). Interestingly, the ascetic who knows how to reach pātāla seems to be a magician, said to come from South India (his father is from dākṣiṇātya). He learned the rituals and mantras to propitiate Hāṭakeśvara (sic!, but certainly identical with Hāṭakeśvara), and then went to Śrīparvata (in Andhra) to worship Śiva. Śiva then directed him to Kashmir, involvement in this act of magic is by no means presented as undesirable. On the contrary, he even helps his subjects to enjoy the company of daitya women for three weeks and is then praised as comparable to Rāma himself.

Female creatures of supernatural powers are involved also in the legendary story of Sandhimat (2.82-110).²⁹ As a minister, he is executed without being guilty, but yoginīs put his bones together and revive him in the cremation ground, in front of his guru. Sandhimat enjoys himself with the intoxicated yoginīs as a ‘leader of their circle’ (cakranāyaka). Subsequently, he becomes a king and a śaiva devotee. The scene of his revival at the cremation ground is clearly a tantric feast of yoginīs. However, unlike in the case of king Baka, this time the (future) king profits from the magic power of yoginīs and can become a king thanks to their intervention. When relating the story, Kalhaṇa is eager to point out that all this was written by fate (vidhi).

It must be remarked that both Raṇāditya and Sandhimat belong to a distant legendary past. Neither of them can be identified with any historically recorded king, and their legendary character and distance in time may explain the indulgence with which Kalhaṇa treats their involvement in tantric magic, which in the case of Sandhimat includes his participation in a transgressive ritual. Moreover, it is also to be noted that after Sandhimat is revived, he no longer practices any tantric rites as a king.

Another story, in which the king also becomes involved in magic, although only indirectly and without any transgression, is that of a hephthalite king, Pravarasena II.³⁰ After learning about the where he was to find one of the holes to descend to the underworld, guarded by Śārikā. It is notable that knowledge of Hātakeśvara and the underworld is associated with the South and Śrīparvata. There is today a small sacred village near Śrīparvata called Hatakeswaram, which may be associated with this Hātakeśvara, but popular etymologies of the name, which all appear rather fanciful, do not refer to this association.

²⁹ For an analysis of this story in the context of yoginī cults, see O. Serbaeva op. cit. p. 193 ff.

³⁰ See RT 3.265 ff. Stein (RT vol. I. p. 66 and pp. 84-5) mentions that Pravarasena II’s coins (with the legend kidāra) can be identified and argues for a dating in the second half of the sixth century. A. Biswas, op. cit. p. 123 accepts a reign of sixty years attributed to this king by Kalhaṇa and arrives at a dating between 537 and 597. Witzel, op. cit. p. 22 seems more cautious and places the same king around 580, similarly to Stein. In addition to śaiva foundations, this king is also said to have installed a set of five, probably śaiva, goddesses in his capital. Kalhaṇa mentions that their names ended with Śrī and that the name of the first death of his father, he meets a holy man, a siddha, on the magic mountain of Śrīparvata. This mountain is most probably identical with Śrīśaīla in Andhra,³¹ although it is not certain whether Kalhaṇa had any precise information about its location. The Śrīparvata is a holy place for kāpālīka and other śaiva ascetics; and the siddha in question, named Aśvapāda, appears before Pravarasena disguised as a pāśupata ascetic (pāśupata-vrati-veṣadhara).³² He explains to the future king that they were fellow sādhakas in a previous birth and that Śiva then promised to make Pravarasena a king. Pravarasena, after practicing asceticism, sees and recognizes Śiva, although Śiva himself is also disguised as an ascetic. The whole story resembles the purāṇic legend of Upamanyu;³³ and the king is only vaguely associated with tantrism, only inasmuch as he is said to have been a sādhaka in a former birth.

The same Aśvapāda reappears at the end of Pravarasena's life. At this point, Aśvapāda claims to be a kāpālīka ascetic³⁴ and is about to send a brahmin messenger to the king, to inform him that his time has come to join Śiva. The brahmin tells Aśvapāda that he is unable to deliver Aśvapāda's letter immediately, since he is exhausted by his travels. To this Aśvapāda replies: 'Then take a purificatory bath now, for you are a brahmin, I am a kāpālīka, and I have touched you.' After these words, Aśvapāda throws the brahmin in a nearby water tank. When the brahmin emerges, he miraculously finds himself in Kashmir. He then manages to deliver was Sadbhāvaśrī, which suggests that they were perhaps ectypes of the goddess of fortune, meant to ensure prosperity in the kingdom. It is rather unlikely that they stand for the eight māṭṛs as Witzel op. cit. suggests, but some circular arrangement was certainly envisaged, just as for māṭṛcakras in which the māṭṛs are in the eight directions. I propose that similarly to the arrangement of Vāma deities (for example in the Vīṇāśikhatantra ed. T. Goudriaan, Delhi, 1985), one deity was meant to stand in the centre and the other four in a circle around her in the four directions, to ensure universal prosperity. Sadbhāvaśrī may have been the central one.

³¹ For a summary of research concerning this identification, certainly valid from around 600 CE, see P. Bisschop, Early Śaivism and the Skandapurāṇa. Sects and Centres. Groningen, 2006, p. 201.

³³ The king himself alludes to the legend of Upamanyu in 3.276.

³⁴ Again, it is not said that he is kāpālīka, but he presents himself as such.

the message to Pravarasena. Pravarasena, obeying Śiva's command, flies up in the sky to join his Lord, making a hole in the ceiling of the Pravareśvara temple.

Although Aśvapāda's exact religious status remains uncertain,³⁵ his powers, location and his own statements suggest that he was a kāpālika ascetic. Whether he was a somasiddhāntin or not, he was certainly considered impure from the orthodox point of view, which is made clear in the course of the story itself. This, however, does not seem to have any adverse effect on the king. Although the king is in contact with him, he is not involved in his impure rites, at least not in his life as a king. Therefore, he remains the ideal laukika devotee in the manner of Upamanyu.

The Rājataranṅinī's account is not limited to śaiva tantric magic. In the fourth book (4.246-62), Caṅkuṇa, who is the brother of a magician specialized in alchemy (rasasiddha), helps the king with two jewel-charms (maṇi), which he then exchanges for a Buddha image. The story suggests that Caṅkuṇa was a Buddhist or became one, and that the king was wise to profit from his services.

It is in the same book that Kalhaṇa makes an interesting remark about kings' employing black magic. He relates a story in which a brahmin uses a khārkhoda (a kind of magic diagram or yantra)³⁶ to kill another brahmin. Later, the king's brother employs this brahmin to kill the king with black magic (abhicāra). In 4.114 Kalhaṇa states, perhaps not without resentment, that from this time onwards, kings employed witchcraft and similar practices against their elder relatives when they desired kingship. In a way, the fourth book and this remark signal a milestone: it is after the fourth book that Kalhaṇa starts speaking of kings' being heavily involved in transgressive rites and behaviour, which results in their downfall.

³⁶ For this diagram, used for killing or expulsion, see A. Sanderson "Religion and the State" pp. 290-2.

What the king is not supposed to do: kaula or krama practice

Contrary to the above examples, king Kalaśa (r. c. 1063-1089)³⁷ becomes himself a tantric practitioner, which contributes to his demise. Kalhaṇa mentions that this king had deeds of mixed kind (śabalakṛtya): he was driven by lust and was attracted to evil gurus, but made important śaiva foundations too. In Kalhaṇa's account, king Kalaśa became influenced by tantric gurus because he had a licentious character from the outset. As he relates (7.276-8):

*dvijendre 'marakaṇṭhe tu yāte śivasamānatām /
rājā pramadakaṇṭhasya yayau tājāsya śiṣyatām // duḥśīlasya prakṛtyaiva tasyākṛtyopadeśakṛt / gamyāgamyavicārasya parihartābhavad guruḥ // guror gatavikalpatvaṃ tasyānyat kim ivocyatām / tyaktaśaṅkaḥ pravavṛte svasutāsurate 'pi yaḥ //*

'After Amarakaṇṭha the eminent royal priest [died and] was united with Śiva, the king became a disciple of [this priest's] son, Pramadakaṇṭha. This guru instructed him, who was disposed to evil by nature, to do forbidden things, and to ignore the difference between women who are approachable and those who are not. What else can be said of this guru who had no scruples? He lacked any inhibition and had sex even with his own daughter.'³⁸

Parts of the description of this tantric guru agrees with the expressions with which some tantric scriptures prescribe practitioners to behave: they are to discard all distinctions between pure and impure (avikalpa),³⁹ and to be free of inhibitions or doubts (aviśaṅkitaḥ).⁴⁰ Incest may be prescribed in order to make the act of ritual copulation free from any sexual desire,⁴¹ but Kalhaṇa may also be exaggerating. Given the context, ‘women who are not to be approached’, agamyā, denotes probably relatives and outcaste women⁴² rather than the upper castes.⁴³

Later on (7.523), Kalaśa is also said to take part in tantric rituals himself.

⁴² They are listed as female partners, dūtīs, in several texts. See, for instance Tantrasadbhāva (D) 15.127cd-129 (borrowed in the Kubjikāmatatantra 25. 153-155ab, ed. T. Goudriaan and J.A. Schoterman, Leiden, 1988), which also prescribes food consumption with them, mixing twice-born and outcaste women (mātā duhitā bhaginī saḥajā ca tathāntyajā // rajakī carmakārī ca mātāṅgī cāgrajātmikā / annapānaṃ tathā bhakṣam ācarec chaktibhiḥ saha // antyājānā[ṃ] dvijānāṃ ca ekatra carubhojanam / kartavyaṃ sādḥakenaiva yadīcchet siddhimuttamām). The Devīdyardhaśatikā (D) 84ab instructs the guru to have a caṇḍāla female ritual partner (guruś cādvaitasamyukto varacaṇḍālisamyutaḥ). See also Tantrāloka 28.39cd-40ab and 29.66. ⁴³ Pandit assumes in his note (p. 284) that superior castes are meant.

The line refers to tantric rites that involve probably more than alcohol or meat consumption.⁴⁴ Mahācaru or ‘great rice meal’ most probably denotes a preparation containing the sexual fluids.⁴⁵ The rite of mahāsamayapūjā does not seem to be a commonly used expression.⁴⁶ At least three different rites are possible candidates for it. First, it could denote the mahāyāga, which, in the Brahmayāmala’s account⁴⁷ is a cremation ground ritual involving the eating of the impure caru and may be associated with the disciple’s initiation. Alternatively, it could be a reference to kaula worship, which again involves the consumption of the impure caru. In this case, it could either refer to regular kaula worship, which could involve (mahā)caru consumption (caruprāśana),⁴⁸ or to a kaula initiation rite,⁴⁹ possibly the kaula version of the samayadīkṣā.⁵⁰ However, since Kalhaṇa uses the plural, one expects rather that some form of regular worship is meant, performed repeatedly, rather than an initiation rite. In fact, the element samaya is likely to denote a meeting (melaka), perhaps in

⁴⁷ See Brahmayāmala chapter 15, as well as 3.225 ff.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Kaulajñānanirṇaya 11.1 ff. ed. P.C. Bagchi, Calcutta, 1934 and S. Hatley, The Brahmayāmala p. 162 note 90.

⁴⁹ See the so-called vedhadīkṣā in Tantrāloka 29.282-3, which ends with caruprāśana.

⁵⁰ See Tantrāloka 29.198cd ff. After describing the kaula samayadīkṣā according to the Mālinīvijayottara, Abhinavagupta mentions an alternative prakriyā (198cd-200), which can even replace the full dīkṣā: the way in which the impure caru offering is accepted and consumed by the disciple determines the degree of his initiation. If he does not hesitate, he is fully initiated; if he trembles, the rite counts as the preliminary Samaya initiation (carv eva vā gurur dadyād vāmāṃrtapariplutam // niḥśaṅkaṃ grahaṇāc chaktigotro māyoyjjhito bhavet / sakampas tv ādadānaḥ syāt samayī vācanādiṣu // kālāntare ‘dhvasaṃśuddhyā pālānāt samayasthiteḥ / siddhipātram iti śrīmadānandeśvara ucyate).

Tantrism, according to Kalhaṇa's account, was taken up by this king out of lust, and his death is explained similarly as due to his overindulgence in pleasures.⁵¹ In this context, Kalhaṇa does not fail to point out (7.726) that Kalaśa's favorite concubine, Kayyā, whom the author considers the shame of womankind, was of low origins (anuccābhijanodbhavā).

Indeed, according to Kalhaṇa, many kings of the Rājataranṅinī fall because of their close contact with low caste people, in particular with women.⁵² King Yaśaskara (r. 939-48)⁵³ is served by outcastes who eat what is left by ḍombas (ḍombocchiṣṭabhuj-) and makes a veśyā his first concubine, without knowing that she is also seeing a watchman. Similarly, king Cakravarman⁵⁴ is assassinated after he becomes infatuated with the daughters of the ḍomba singer, Raṅga. As Kalhaṇa puts it sarcastically:⁵⁵ 'Robbers for ministers, a ḍomba for queen and ḍombas for friends: what wonder of the world was there that did not belong to king Cakravarman?' (Or: Did not king Cakravarman possess a wonder of the world?)

These remarks and king Kalaśa's story show that Kalhaṇa certainly did not consider it proper for a king to be involved in transgressive tantric rites, in particular in kaula and krama ritual. At one point, he seems to reject explicitly the use of several impure substances as well as new-fangled tantric gurus. The passage describes a period of golden age during the reign of king Yaśaskara by listing various things that gurus and brahmins did not do during that time.⁵⁶ The first verse seems to be understood as a general statement about this golden age without any tantric reference, but the second and the third refer to tantric gurus in particular.

⁵¹ The word atisambhoga is used in 7.699.

⁵³ RT. 6.69 ff. In other respects, this king's reign is presented in a good light by Kalhaṇa.

⁵⁵ RT 5.391: mantriṇas taskarā rājñī śvapāki śvapacāḥ priyāḥ / kim na lokottaram abhūd bhūpateś cakravarmaṇaḥ.

⁵⁶ The full description can be found in RT 6.2-13, of which I cite verses 10-12.

*na vipraguravaḥ sāma gāyanto madirāṃ papuḥ /
na tāpasāḥ putradārapaśudhānyāny adhaukayan //*

Brahmin preceptors⁵⁷ did not drink wine while chanting the Sāmaveda, and ascetics did not take wives, children, cattle and corn.

*na mūrkhaguravo matsyāpūpayāgavidhāyinaḥ /

Ignorant gurus, who perform ritual worship with fish and cakes,⁵⁸ did not revise philosophical and scriptural statements⁵⁹ in their own writings.

*nādrśyanta ca gehinyo gurudīkṣoṭhadevatāḥ /

Housewives did not figure as deities during the initiation of gurus, denying their husbands' virtue and dignity by the shaking of their heads / bringing their husbands, virtues and glory to contempt by shaking their heads.

Contrary to Stein's understanding,⁶⁰ who takes the last verse to imply that women criticized their husband's conduct by shaking their heads, I propose that the verse refers to tantric ritual, possibly

⁵⁹ Pandit's translation seems more precise on tarkāgama, which he clearly takes as a Dvandva compound to denote 'philosophy and scriptures,' while Stein speaks of 'traditional doctrines.'

kaula, in which women are involved and worshipped.⁶¹ The shaking, expressed with the word dhūnana, is among the commonly listed signs (pratyaya) to prove the presence of Śakti.⁶² Here, this shaking is used by Kalhaṇa in a satirical way: he suggests it shows that these women deny or bring to shame their husbands' virtues and/or their own.

That more transgressive tantric currents were not appreciated by Kalhaṇa is also seen in his treatment of Cakrabhāṇu, a famous Krama master.⁶³ Kalhaṇa relates two versions of how king Yaśaskara died.⁶⁴ First, he mentions that when after two or three days the sick king still had not died, his confidants, relatives, servants and velāvittas (officials), who were in a hurry to seize the kingdom, gave him poison.⁶⁵ According to the alternative version, which Kalhaṇa does not accept to be true, it was the magician Vīranātha, Cakrabhāṇu's uncle,⁶⁶ who magically caused the king's death, to revenge the humiliation of his nephew. Kalhaṇa argues that the purpose of this alternative version is only to exalt the power of tantric gurus, and that it is more likely to assume that the king died due to a disease he had anyway (which is, in fact, a third version of the story).

Now as we have seen, Kalhaṇa does not always refrain from giving rather fanciful explanations of events. Therefore, it is ⁶¹ See e.g. cakrayāga by André Padoux in TAK vol. II. The Tantrāloka includes this in its chapter on kaula ritual (29.56 ff.).

⁶² Timirodghātana (manuscript NAK pam 690, NGMPP A35/3 transcribed by Somdev Vasudeva and recollated by the present author) 4.20 mentions dhunana as a sign of possession by the power of Rudra (rudrasaktisamāveśa). See also Kaulajñānanirṇaya 14.16, in which it is the second sign. Dhunana is also said to be a sign observed during initiation of putrakas (Tantrāloka 16.33d ff.), provoked by the rite of avalokana (the empowered gaze of the guru) in a certain type of initiate (listed as second). Similarly, the Kubjikāmatatantra (4.70 ff.), borrowing from Tantrasadbhāva (D) 3.93 ff, lists it as a sign produced by the second type of saṃkrānti or 'transmission of grace,' by the guru, which is called avaloka. See the entry avaloka by Teun Goudriaan in TAK vol. I. The Jayadrathayāmala (manuscript of the 4th Śaṅka NAK 1-1468, NGMPPB122/4 transcribed by Olga Serbaeva) 4.65.31d also mentions it as being produced during initiation. Brahmayāmala 54.134, however, lists it as a sign (chommaka) by which a certain type of yoginī can be recognized, similarly to the Tantrasadbhāva (D) 16.227, which attributes it to śākinīs.

possible that here he went for a more plausible version of the story not simply because it seemed more probable, but because he did not want to attribute too much power to Krama adepts, who, as he mentions, took part in the orgiastic rite of cakramelaka, and were punished by the king himself.⁶⁷

Conclusion: Kāvya and instruction

To summarize Kalhaṇa's position concerning tantrism: if the king uses mantras to obtain superhuman powers and effects, even if they only serve his own pleasure, or if the king makes use of an untouchable practitioner such as a kāpālika indirectly, Kalhaṇa has no objections. This is especially true if the king belongs to the more distant past. However, he presents the king's direct involvement in transgressive tantric rituals (mahācarubhojana, yoginīsādhana) as undesirable and dangerous. He is particularly against kaula or krama rites, which may involve not only impure substances, but rites performed with women, even with untouchable women. Kaula rites in general and the king's direct involvement in any transgressive rites usually cause the decline and fall of a king— this seems to be the moral of the stories. And this moral is not to be taken as secondary to historiography in the Rājataranṅinī. For Kalhaṇa does not intend his Rājataranṅinī to be a history book in the first place, but a piece of poetry, kāvya,⁶⁸ which should give emperors instruction, a kind of remedy to counteract various types of royal excess. As Kalhaṇa himself puts it:

*iyam nṛpānām ullāse hrāse vā deśakālayoḥ /
bhaiṣajyabhūtasamvādikathā yuktopayujyate //*

‘The present account [of mine, which] in correspondence (yuktā) to time and place fully agrees (samvādin) with what has happened [in the past] (bhūta), is a remedy, prescribed (upayujyate) for presumptuousness or timidity of kings.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ This primary aim has been brought out and analysed in detail by W. Slaje “In the Guise of Poetry”.

I understand this statement, in agreement with R.S. Pandit,⁷⁰ R. Salamon and W. Slaje, to imply that the work is meant as beneficial instruction for kings. As Salamon and Slaje point out, ullāsa and hrāsa refer either to prosperity and depression in general, or to the king's condition in particular.⁷¹ Both conditions are viewed here as potentially difficult for kings to deal with, therefore both conditions require special instructions. As Slaje summarizes: 'Awareness of the fates of their predecessors on the throne should serve the kings as medication, antidoting the disease of extremes.'

Kalhaṇa's statements about tantric practices must also be viewed in the light of his intention to instruct. His view on religion appears to be similar to Jayanta Bhaṭṭa's view of sarvāgamaprāmānya:⁷² any scripture can be accepted as valid, if (in addition to some other conditions) it does not cause abhorrence or fear among people (yebhyo nodvijate janah). This considerable ⁶⁹ I cite W. Slaje's translation (op. cit. pp. 323-3), which is the only one to bring out the sense of bhūtasamvādi.

⁷⁰ It must be remarked that Pandit's translation is the first to point out the right direction of interpretation, against Stein and Buhler.

tolerance,⁷³ in turn, is not of dharmasāstric or brahmanical origin, and was probably not motivated by a theoretical conviction:⁷⁴ it is, as has been shown in the case of Jayanta Bhaṭṭa, rather a reflection of existing royal practice in Kashmir, at least from Śaṅkaravarman's time. Given that Kalhaṇa also expects kings to be his audience, his tolerance is bound to be determined in a similar way.

There are, however, important differences between Jantabhāṭṭa's and Kalhaṇa's attitude. Unlike Jayantabhāṭṭa, in no way does Kalhaṇa attempt to put forward a theoretical argument in favour of, or against, certain kinds of tolerance. Since his work is intended to give a general lesson to kings, Kalhaṇa does not try to determine which religious movements should be banned, either, if any at all. His main concern is the king's—and, consequently, his subjects'—prosperity, therefore his advice concerns the king: it is the king that should not be involved in transgressive rituals. The people will then, Kalhaṇa implies in his description of Yaśaskara's reign, follow his example.

Moreover, one must also bear in mind that Kalhaṇa himself was śaiva (perhaps with a Buddhist uncle) which may have played some role in his view concerning religious tolerance. It could be assumed that as a śaiva he was more inclined to accept unusual śaiva practices. However, it is perhaps even more likely that being a śaiva, he found transgressive śaiva practices less acceptable, for they could possibly defame śaivism as a whole. All this remains of course highly speculative. But whatever were Kalhaṇa's motivations, he clearly stands in the relatively tolerant tradition of many Kashmirian rulers, a tradition that would be worth exploring in more detail.

APPENDIX

List of potential references to tantric practices and deities in Kalhaṇa's Rājatarāṅgiṇī

Not all the passages listed below are references to tantrism, but they are often suggestive of a tantric background. When compiling this list, I tried to include all references or allusions to tantrism, and preferred erring on the side of listing too much rather than omitting something. I have not included references to Saiddhāntika śaivism, as they have been amply analysed in A. Sanderson "Kashmir" and "The Śaiva Age," and because they are not relevant in the context of the present study, which deals with the question of how transgressive tantric rites are represented by Kalhaṇa. References to goddesses who may not be tantric but who are associated with bloody offerings and the like have, however, been included, because such goddesses may be associated with transgressive rites.

1.110-113 King Jalauka, said to be Aśoka's son, obtains powers often attributed to tantric practices. He can transform other metals into gold thanks to a magic substance and obtains charming youth through intercourse with Nāga women. His instructor is Avadhūta, a possible double of a later siddha. The name Jalauka comes perhaps from a hephthalite name, Javūka, see A. Sanderson, "Kashmir" p. 106.

1.122 Īśānadevī placed circles of mothers at the entry points to Kashmir. They are probably not tantric, although Stein identifies them with the tantric devīcakra mentioned in 1.333, also referred to as māṭṛcakra in 1.335. (Cf. also māṭṛcakra in 1.348, 3.99, 5.55.)

1.155-6 Dāmodara II was Kubera's friend and Guhyakas obeyed him. This is not necessarily a tantric reference, but tantras often promise the power to control yakṣas and yakṣīs.

1.234 ff. A watchman, who is a māntrika, does not let the Nāgas touch the crop, which he himself does not touch either, due to a vow he has taken. He appears to keep them away thanks to his mantric power, which implies a tantric mantrasādhana. Then a brahmin plays a trick on the māntrika ascetic: he drops fresh corn in his food to break his observance. Due to the (inadvertent) breaking of his vow, the ascetic can no longer keep the Nāgas away. Thus the brahmin saves the Nāgas.

1.331 ff. The sorceress Bhaṭṭā sacrifices king Baka to a circle of goddesses (devīcakra), to gain superhuman powers. The memory of this event is kept alive by the deity Śatakapāleśa, the circle of mothers and a rock bearing the prints of Bhaṭṭā's knees (when she flew up into the sky) at the monastery of Kherī. See O. Serbaeva Yoginīs p. 193.

1.347-8 Narendrāditya I / Khiñkhila had Ugra as guru. Ugra constructed a shrine for Ugreśa, surrounded by a circle of mothers, who are probably not tantric.

2.82-110 Minister Saṃdhimat is executed without being guilty but is then revived by yoginīs in front of his guru, Īśāna. He enjoys himself with the yoginīs and later becomes king (2.116) and a great śaiva devotee. See O. Serbaeva op. cit. p.193 ff.

3.31-69 King Meghavāhana sees a barbarian (śabara/kirāta) about to kill a man in front of a Caṇḍikā/Cāmuṇḍā temple. The barbarian wants to offer the victim to save his son from dying. The king volunteers to become the victim and is about to cut his own head off, when Varuṇa appears and saves him. The king had to go through this ordeal because of his cruel ancestor, Mihirakula, although he was compassionate himself. Varuṇa later helps him to cross over to Lañkā. (Nb: the story resembles very much the Vikramāditya stories.)

3.83-95 A brahmin claims that without giving an animal oblation (forbidden under Meghavāhana) to Durgā, his son will perish. The king decides again to sacrifice himself. During the night, Durgā restores the boy. Kalhaṇa is embarrassed to relate this unbelievable story.

3.99 Śreṣṭhasena/Pravarasena I. establishes Pravareśvara with a circle of mothers. (This is probably not tantric. Moreover, the verse itself may be spurious. It is supplied only by Stein's manuscript A3, and missing in L, according to Stein.)

3.267 ff and 3.366 ff. A siddha named Aśvapāda pretends first to be a pāśupata, then a kāpālika. He lives on Śrīparvata and has supernatural powers, such as sending a messenger back to Kashmir in a second.

3.340 ff The story of the foundation of Pravarapura (ancient Shrinagar) involves a rākṣasa or vetāla. Although it has nothing tantric on its own, the fact that the king is helped by this creature may allude to his tantric powers.

3.353 Pravarasena II establishes Sadbhāvaśrī and four other goddesses. They are clearly śaiva deities (the king is śaiva), but they may or may not receive tantric worship.

3.374-8 In order to join Śiva, Pravarasena II flies up into the sky, making a hole in the ceiling of the temple. Although the aim is his liberation (mokṣa), and no tantric allusion is made, the act implies an ability often promised in tantras: khecaratva.

3.465 ff. The Hātakeśvara mantra is given to king Raṇāditya by the queen, who is a manifestation of the goddess Bhramaravāsini. The king goes to the underworld (pātāla), and enjoys himself there (pātālasiddhi).

4.94 ff. With a khārkhoda, a brahmin kills another one. 4.112 ff: The king's brother uses the guilty brahmin to kill the king through black magic (abhicāra). 4.114 states that from this time on, kings used witchcraft (abhicāra) etc. 4.124: When brahmins wanted to eliminate this king, they destroyed him with secret witchcraft (gūḍhābhicāreṇa). 4.246-63 Caṅkuṇa, the brother of a magician (rasasiddha), produces gold by magic (rasena); he then creates a dry passage in water with a charm (maṇi) and withdraws the charm with another one from the water. Then he exchanges these two charms for a Buddha image.

4.276 mentions the establishment of a Śiva Cakreśvara (image). This may not be tantric, but Cakreśvara is often a ruler of yoginīs.

4.390 ff. King Kuvalayāpīḍa obtains siddhi through quietism (śama) and shows himself even today to the pious on Śrīparvata.

4.594-604 A Dravidian magician dries up a lake with arrow mantras (which is preceded by the rite of digbandhana). He almost kills a Nāga, Mahāpadma, whom the king saves.

5.48 ff. Śūra, a minister of Avantivarman, has a dāmara chief decapitated in front of a Bhairava image. The situation suggests a mock human sacrifice.

5.66 Kallaṭa is mentioned as a great siddha. Other holy siddhas are also referred to during Avantivarman. (See A. Sanderson "Kashmir" p. 120.)

5.239 Another mention of the khārkhoda (cf. 4.94 above). A treasurer is found to have cheated. He asks a relative to help, who causes the king to die with the help of a khārkhoda. This relative of the treasurer (called Rāmadeva) then commits suicide.

5.390 King Cakravarman is attracted to domba singers and other low caste people, śvapākas. 5.392: A śvapāka woman offers her clothes with menstrual stains, which ministers intend to use for clothes. 5.400: Intercourse with a śvapāka woman. Tantrism is not referred to, but the use of menstrual blood may allude to it.

5.469-75 Pīṭhadevī's benediction of Yaśaskara. Pīṭhadevī is likely to be tantric, as Stein also remarks ad loc.

6.10-12 Description of a golden age and what was not practiced during Yaśaskara: brahmins did not drink alcohol, no matsyāpūpa sacrifices were performed, scriptures were not revised, house-wives did not act as divinities shaking their heads.

6.108-112 Mention of the tantric rite of cakramelaka, the Krama author Cakrabhāṇu and Vīranātha (=Hrasvanātha). See A. Sanderson, “The Śaiva Exegesis of Kashmir” pp. 280-90.

6.121-2 Parvagupta tries to employ witchcraft (karmābhicārakam) to destroy the child-king, Saṃgrāmadeva.

7.17-9 A fire offering of human hair (keśahoma) produces a demoness (kr̥tyā), who then turns against the brahmins who produced her. Stein identifies the rite as purāṇic (cf. Padmapurāṇa 2.23.5ff, Delhi, 1984-5), but it may be of tantric origin.

7.44 A cruel tax officer is compared to a kāpālika who lives on corpses (śavājīvaḥ). Stein takes this to refer to the kāpālika sect, but it is also possible that by kāpālika the cremation ground attendant is meant, as in 8.995.

7.276 ff. Kalaśa is under the bad influence of a guru, who incites him to have intercourse with women not to be had. The guru seems to be tantric. In 7. 279 ff, the story of the cat-merchant also has tantric aspects, as Stein remarks, although the cat-merchant himself may not be tantric or, in any case, he does not teach any identifiable tenets.

7.523 King Kalaśa takes part in mahāsamaya rites, drinks with gurus etc.

7.799-800 Kālī is mentioned as representing death, which is not necessarily tantric.

7.1129 ff. Harṣa has slave girls who pretend they were instructed by gods. In 7.1132-3 they pretend to have the elixir of long life and to perform piṇḍasiddhi. The slave girls thus appear to pretend that they are powerful yoginīs, who receive divine instructions directly.

7.1230 During the massacre of ḍāmaras the country of Kashmir became like Bhairava’s kitchen. This is not tantric, but suggestive of a tantric Bhairava.

7.1233 The governor sent to a Bhairava-like king strings of lavanya heads. Not tantric, but suggestive.

7.1635 Harṣa takes refuge at the house of a magician (siddha) called Somānanda, who worships Someśvara. This may be a tantric magician, but no further detail is given.

7.1707 Harṣa standing on the body of a soldier is compared to Cāmuṇḍā standing on Ruru. As Stein points out, the image is purāṇic (see Padmapurāṇa 5.26.59-95), but again suggestive of a tantric background.

[It is remarkable that the eighth book contains almost no historical reference to tantric practices by kings or others. Almost all references are found in similes or metaphors. It seems that Kalhaṇa is particularly silent on the religious practices of his own contemporaries.]

8.45 King Uccala remembers like magic spells (mantravat) two useful counsels.

8.90 If a man raises up a kāyastha (utthāpyate) and gives him distinction, the rogue slays him without scruples, just like a [resurrected corpse or a] vetāla would (vetāla iva). [This is a reference to the use of a vetāla (or of a resurrected corpse) as a servant, also called vetālasādhana. This supernatural power, figuring already in the earliest tantra, the Niśvāsa's Guhyasūtra, is perhaps also named uttiṣṭha; see my entry uttiṣṭha in TAK vol. III. Addenda and corrigenda.]

8.106: Kāyastha officials chased away and humiliated by the king devote themselves to reciting stotras and mumbling spells like the durgottāriṇīvidyā. [Stein himself remarks that this may allude to a tantric text, or possibly the Devīmāhātmya. The latter is less likely. The word durgottāriṇī, perhaps denoting a mantra deity, figures in a list in the Kubjikā upaniṣad, ed. T.Goudriaan and J.A. Schoterman, Groningen, 1994, etext by Somdev Vasudeva.]

8.143 lists various things the king is supposed to have given to tantric gurus (bhaṭṭapādānām), according to the falsified accounts of a merchant. The word bhaṭṭapāda denotes tantric gurus, according to Stein.

8.759 Pṛthivīhara rushes about in battle like a vetāla intoxicated by a drink (madhumattena ... vetāleneva). [This is probably not tantric; but it could also refer to the resurrected vetāla, see 8.90.]

8.995 Mañkha, a ḍāmara, searches dead bodies like a kāpālika and gratifies himself with the objects found upon them. Lorenzen (The Kāpālikas and the Kālāmukhas, p. 66) takes the word kāpālika here to denote a skull-bearer, but Stein remarks in a note that it is probably used in the sense of 'attendant at the burning ground,' who obtains the clothes and other possessions of the dead person before burning the body. Stein also refers to Mārkaṇḍeyapurāṇa 8.105 ff. The wording, prītim ... āyayau ('is pleased' with the objects found upon them) does not have any particular religious connotation and kāpālikas did not gratify themselves with objects found on dead bodies (but rather with alcohol etc.). Given the wording and the context, Stein's interpretation is much more likely.

8.1211 During famine, the ground scattered with fragments of skulls and of (rather than ‘from,’ as Stein has it) fleshless human skeletons performs, as it were, a kāpālika vow. (Ref. also given in Lorenzen, op. cit. p. 66.)

8.1369 The night seems to be frequented by furious (or intoxicated) vetālas and filled with Kālarātrī demons. (This is not necessarily tantric, although Kālarātrīs often figure in tantric texts.)

8.2187 The service of a king is more dangerous than the raising of a vetāla (vetālothāpana). Cf. 8.90.

8.2241 A youth sacrifices his own life without an immediate cause: he has planned his death, because his mind was seized by a charm (kr̥tyā) which the brahmins had sent. (Although Kr̥tyās are not necessarily tantric.)

8.3427 Cippatajayāpīḍa’s uncles, Utpala and the rest, by mutual consent killed him by witchcraft (abhicāreṇa).

Mention must be made of the Kashmirian festival called āśvayujgāli. It is not a tantric event, but the transgressive behaviour prescribed may be inspired by tantric prescriptions. See RT 5.710 and 7.1551, and cf. Nilamata 391. Stein also remarks ad loc a reference given by Alberuni.

Kalhaṇa also speaks of a rite named kṣāntīcaru ‘rice offering of appeasement,’ which may possibly be tantric, although I have not found any other occurrences. RT 7.15 speaks of the expulsion of a king as (a symbolic) kṣāntīcaru. See also 8.2513, which says that the wailing of villagers served as kṣāntīcaru.
